

I can understand telemarketing companies wanting a national standard rule for calling people.

However, I am a signee of the Indiana State Att. Gen's no call list. I don't want it diluted.

I pay for telephone service my MY use not some salesman bothering me with pitches that I have no use for.

The past telemarketing rules that the companies were to remove your name and not call again do not work.

I kept a call log for over two years and could tell the callers that they have violated the do not call request.

Now that I am on the Indiana no call list I can say that it works. I was not an early signee because I figured it would not work.

I have received one call. The telemarketer had stooped so low that they pulled my name, from the Verisign information for web page domain names, as administrative contact.

They actually thought that I was going to buy computer parts from them just because I manage the web page... I DO NOT NEED THIS SORT OF AGGRAVATION...

If you are going to set a national standard, model it from the Indiana law, Please...